

a man who lived a placid life he was that man. There is scarcely a ripple on the surface of his career. From his birth to his death there were not incidents enough to make a headline in a modern newspaper. He was a commonplace man, an actor in no great public events, yielding instead of standing up for his rights, as most as Moses. He was kicked and called about by Ishmael in his youth, yet he never struck back. He was led to an altar of sacrifice to his manhood, and he uttered no protest. Even his wife was selected for him by his father, and he took her for better or worse without cavil. He was robbed by the Philistines of the veil which his father had dug and he simply moved on to another place. He was deceived by his own children in his dying bed, yet he gave up his preferences without a murmur. And how much better it was for him, his everyday experiences and numerous fairs, than as if he had fought for his rights, everlastingly troubled with his neighbors, feared every time he was insulted, picked out whenever his corns were aching, and busied his puckering lips in an effort to get even with enemies.

It does not always follow that the who make the most noise in the world is the most useful. Brigandage look also on dress parade when it comes to a battle, and a vain soldier in dust-covered boots loses the business. The cork on the top of the wave and you imagine it is directing the sea. It is possible to spread oneself as to be of no use anywhere. It does not follow that he who is in everybody's way has reached his goal.

Under the second ruling of the Inter-State Commerce Commission, railroads are required to furnish cars to shippers within six days after order is placed of dimensions ordered. His order will benefit the smaller shipper of lumber and all who generally hasty wait for the larger operator to ship. Land to a large measure prevents tipping of the car distributor. Sometime ago an agent approached by a shipper chastised for not placing a to be loaded and the agent said: "You are the only man didn't cough up."

Some Happy Sayings.
"Real etiquette," says Judge Pettigill in the Chanute Tribune, "is looking out of the window while your guest drinks out the finger bowl." Some other opinions handed down by the judge this week were these: "The short skirts the women are wearing make them look much younger. Some of them, in fact, will be run in by the school."
